

Should solar panels be adopted in developing countries?

The adoption of household solar panels would allow for a leapfrogging from traditional to modern energy sources (van Benthem, 2015). This concept is particularly important within the framework of developing countries, partly skipping the step of grid investment, which is quite costly and delays the transition to clean energy adoption.

Does home ownership influence solar panel adoption?

In addition, dwelling ownership is a substantial facilitator of solar panel uptake. This result is complemented by the establishment of a positive relationship between the number of people in the household and solar panel adoption. Furthermore, rural location appears to incentivize solar panel adoption.

Where should policymakers support household solar energy uptake in developing countries?

Policymakers may consider supporting households far from capital cities, in sunnier regions, and with low levels of assets. This study investigates household solar energy uptake in developing countries by combining household surveys for 11 countries with area-level data.
